> ---Results of Thorough Manuring.

One of our neighbors, with land not any too good, barely able to support a family tried upon advice the experiment of apply-ing manure to wheat, spread on the surface. It was compost, also made upon recommendation, and applied evenly on the land just before sowing. Only part of the lot was thus treated. The wheat was sown, and the land well harrowed. At the end of the fall the difference was so great tha a distinct line marked the manure part, It seemed all difference, and was noted by every one that passed. This was most gratifying.

In the spring there was still the differ-ence; a whitish and partly green hue pervaded the manured part. The rest was merely barren. Here and there on the manured part, where the land was wet, the grain lay on the surface. This, however, only in a few small spots. In a short time the manuring part was a dense green, the rest straggling and backward, and most discouraging to all who saw it. Toward the last this, however, brought up some in comparison with the other. The manured part grew less rank and matured well, yielding over 200 per cent. more than the other. An estimate was made of the expense of the manure and labor, and there was something nice over in favor of the

But the best, perhaps, is not yet told. The land had been seeded down early in the spring, and it was recommended to use plenty of seed, which was but partially fol-lowed out. Still the manured part of the lot showed not only a good catch, but what was thought a thick stand, growing well, and continuing late in the fall. The rest of the lot was as usual, a poor thing, not paying for seeding; there was not the catch and not the growth as in the other.

This satisfied. The year following the difference was still greater (in the two crops which it was advised to cut), not so much before harvesting as in the crops secured. Then it was found what a little manure did-that it brought all the seed, while the rest had lost much of it that did not come, and did not grow so well. In the spring following, upon advisement, the land was plowed and put to corn; the difference being even greater here, if possible, than in the preceding crops. This was fol-lowed by barley and oats mixed, continuing the same difference-a large crop on the manured part, an ordinary on the other. Seed was sown, and nearly the same variation was observable. But before this last was reached other land was treated similary, only that the manure was applied to the whole field. The neighbors took the contagion-all but the indolentand there is a general improvement. Why is it that this thing is not done more? So repeatedly is it advised to top-dress with manure land that is sown, if poor and intended to seed down. And yet people are not doing it, only the few. It pays in the grain, and still more in the grass crop which is to follow, and in after culture. It is the manure that helps the grass (or clover) to the nutriment of the at-mosphere, after first being established in the soil, getting not only a catch, but a ernment, State, County, City, and thick stand. Then, aided by a little plas-Railroad Bonds and coupons, Bank ter, there can be no failure, especially with
